

Black unemployment and bad career prospects are to be fought by an employment agency, set up to deal specifically with the needs of black professionals.

Equinox Associates, a Brixton-based consultancy, is inviting the many black professionals who feel left out and discriminated against at work to visit their offices, and discuss their future.

"We've talked to employers who want to put black people into management positions, and implement equal opportunities policies fairly," said Maxine James, Equinox's project co-ordinator.

"We know that qualified, experienced people are out there. We can bring the two together."

This new service grew out of Equinox's past work as a consultancy, running courses. Their successful experience in finding posts for ex-GLC employees inspired Maxine James and Ade Sawyer to expand their operation.

For the past three years Equinox have also been advising Black business people on successful marketing, personnel and finance, as well as running business workshops and a self employment course.
